1. Rosalie Warren, the woman in the picture, is a university student. Does that surprise you? Why or why not?
2. As you read, guess the meaning of the boldfaced words from the surrounding words and sentences.

As Rosalie Warren stood at the mailbox in the lobby of her apartment building in May 1980, she shared the anxiety of many other college seniors. In her hand was an envelope containing her final grades. As she nervously opened it, Warren wondered whether her hundreds of hours of studying had paid off.

They had.

"I got five A's," she still recalls with elation. "I almost fell on the floor!"

Warren would graduate from Suffolk University with a bachelor of science degree in philosophy and history. At age 80. Three years later, at 83, she would receive her second degree from Suffolk, a master's in education.

Now, with both diplomas proudly displayed in her apartment, Warren is not finished with learning. Now 93, she continues for her 18th year at Suffolk under a program that allows persons 65 and over to attend classes tuition free.¹ "It's my life to go to school, to enjoy being in an academic atmosphere," she says. "That's what I love."

Warren was born Rosalie Levey on Aug. 29, 1900. Two years after she entered high school, her father died. Warren had to leave school for factory work to help support her family's 10 children. Warren describes herself as a "person who always liked school," and she says the move "broke my heart completely because I couldn't finish high school."

In the end, however, "I went to school nights," she recalls. "Any place I could find an outlet of learning and teaching, I was there."

A short time later, her mother became ill, and Warren had to care for her, once again putting her education on hold.

Finally, in 1921, her mother, now recovered, drew from her savings to send Warren to Boston University for two years to study typing, stenography, and office procedures.

Those courses helped Warren gain several long-term office positions over the next 60 years, but her yearning "to be in the academic field" continued.

In 1924, she married Eugene Warren, and seven years later, her daughter, Corinne, was born. In 1955, by then a widow² and a grandmother, Warren took a bus tour across the United States that was to last nine months. She said she wanted to see "things you never see in the West End."

When she returned home, she took a book-keeping position and also enrolled in courses in philosophy, sociology, and Chinese history.

In 1975, when she was 75, Warren learned from a neighbor about Suffolk University's tuition-free program for senior citizens. "I was at the registrar's office the very next day," she recalls. At first, she took one or two courses at a time, but encouraged by her professors, she enrolled as a degree candidate.³

"I hadn't studied for so many years," she says, "but I was determined." For the next four years, Warren, who calls herself a "student of philosophy," worked toward her degree.

Nancy Stoll, dean of students at Suffolk, says Warren is "an interesting role model for our younger students—that learning is a lifetime activity. . . . She is genuinely enthusiastic about being here, and that permeates⁴ her activities and is contagious to students and faculty."

▲▲▲ Making Connections

Choose one of the questions below to write about in your journal:

Change: Do you think tuition-free academic programs for senior citizens are a good idea? Why or why not? What else could we do to improve the lives of senior citizens?

Identity: Do you know someone like Rosalie Warren? Describe him or her.

Conflict: When Warren started taking university courses at age 75, she hadn't studied in school for many years. What kinds of problems do you think she had? In what ways might her age and experience have helped her?

Relationships: Nancy Stoll says that Rosalie Warren is an interesting role model for younger students. Do you agree? In your opinion, what might younger students learn from Warren?

Choice: When Warren was younger, she had to choose between helping her family and going to school. If you were in a similar situation, what would you do? Why?
